QUICK REFERENCE GUIDE FOR

Breastfeeding: Dads are Important, Too!

You Can Help Your Baby's Mother Breastfeed

Thank you for supporting your baby's mother as she breastfeeds. Every day your child grows happy and healthy, you can know that you have had an important part in his/her health and happiness. Your support and help in everyday tasks around the house made it possible for your baby to have the time to do their job of growing with the mother's milk, the miracle liquid that science can never imitate.

Be Knowledgeable.

No one expects you to know how it works without some help.

Be Patient.

Breastfeeding takes a while for both mom and baby.

Be Supportative.

Don't try and talk her out of it.

- Attend a breastfeeding class with the baby's mother.
- Ask lots of questions.
- Read a book about breastfeeding, such as A Nursing Mother's Companion by Kathleen Huggins, The Womanly Art of Breastfeeding by La Leche League, or the American Academy of Pediatrics Guide to Breastfeeding.
- Let mom rest between feedings.
- When visitors come during feedings, answer the door for her, entertain them or ask them to come back another time.
- Bring her a glass of juice or some nutritious snacks.
- Hold her hand.
- Whisper encouraging words to her as she nurses.
- Give her a back rub.
- Your baby won't need bottles for a while. Give breastfeeding a chance.
- Bottles can make it harder or easier.
